

Master's thesis - information from the supervisor to the assessment committee

It is not the supervisor's responsibility to assess the work of the student(s), but the supervisor can inform the examiners about factors that the examiners should know about when assessing the work. These include:

- Practical circumstances, beyond the students' control, that might have had a negative impact on the work. An example might be laboratory equipment that was delayed or was not available as intended.
- Information about the supervision and completion of the thesis, for example, that the student(s) showed little independence and needed exceptionally high levels of supervision and follow-up, or that, due to circumstances that must be described, supervision was not available or not provided as intended.
- Other information that the supervisor wants to communicate to the examiners

Information from the supervisor must be communicated to the students concerned.
